

Affair (n.)

In terms of global awareness, reading news keeps people from all walks of life in touch with local as well as global affairs.

Bubble (n.)

In stark contrast, when we opt for locking ourselves in a self-contained bubble, we are destined to gradually grow indifferent to society and, as a result, see the world from a limited perspective.

Destined (adj.)

In stark contrast, when we opt for locking ourselves in a self-contained bubble, we are destined to gradually grow indifferent to society and, as a result, see the world from a limited perspective.

Indifferent (adj.)

In stark contrast, when we opt for locking ourselves in a self-contained bubble, we are destined to gradually grow indifferent to society and, as a result, see the world from a limited perspective.

Inevitable (adj.)

If we are to gain beneficial nutrients from social media, it is inevitable for us to be selective in what we feed ourselves.

Inseparable (adj.)

Having discussed that exposure to news creates awareness among people as well as trains people to think more independently about social issues, I reckon that news is, and will remain, an inseparable part of our lives.

Nutrient (n.)

If we are to gain beneficial nutrients from social media, it is inevitable for us to be selective in what we feed ourselves.

Over-exaggerated (adj.)

While many consider that the news provided on different media platforms plays such an integral part in our daily lives that its importance cannot be over-exaggerated, others maintain that social media makes people inundated with nothing but trivial information and celebrity scandals.

Penetration (n.)

With the increasing penetration of media in the age of information, whether or not we should be more cautious of how media affects us has triggered a lively debate.

Reckon (v.)

Having discussed that exposure to news creates awareness among people as well as trains people to think more independently about social issues, I reckon that news is, and will remain, an inseparable part of our lives.